Not illustrated. 1857 Excerpt: .The undisputed sovereignty of the Lower House depends but in part on legal or historical doctrines. The power is derived not merely from the constituency, but from the personal reputation of its leaders, from the social position of a large portion of its members, and from the identification of the entire body with the wealthier and more highly-educated classes. Even in America, the obscure delegates who fill the House of Representatives take little share in the government of the country. The Senate, on the other hand, is powerful, because its members are eminent; and the senator from Vermont or from Delaware commands equal attention with the mouthpiece of the millions of New York. The people cannot govern, even by its nominees, except on condition of choosing qualified rulers. The national sympathy and support, which constitute the true strength of representative assemblies, would never attend on a...
