Excerpt: . . . of her immediate followers, but that he should beware of approaching her in any spirit but that of purely platonic affection. If he wants proof of this necessity, he need only look round within the bounds of the profession he follows; he will find many warnings in the mistakes of his fellow artists, in the dull, unthinking realism of this artist, in the extravagant and incredible fantasy of that one whose dreams have run beyond all reason into a convention which is so unreal that it has ceased to be anything but ridiculous. But he will find, also, that quite a considerable group of sane workers are setting him a sound example of thoughtful effort to present nature in her best array of ideal graces and under aspects which enhance without exaggeration her greatest charms. There is, indeed, in existence now a very notable school of painters who have found a thoroughly correct middle course between the bombast of what was once called imaginative landscape and the crude reality which results from visual accuracy undirected by taste, who have learned to understand the sentiment of nature and at the same time to eliminate from their work everything which might clash with this sentiment or diminish its pictorial value. These men work in a spirit of wholesome romanticism, seeing rightly what are the poetic possibilities of the subjects they prefer and expressing by well controlled technical devices convictions which are based upon fundamental artistic principles....
