In mature loblolly pines, the microfibrillar or fibril angle is fibril angle of 40 , longitudinal shrinkage of radiata pine small, averaging about 5 to 10 as measured by deviation compression wood was 2. 5 , whereas that of normal wood from the vertical. In juvenile wood, the fibril angle is large, was only 1 . In trees with strongly expressed compression wood in the juvenile core, longitudinal shrinkage of and often up to 50 in rings next to the averaging 25 to 35 summerwood was 3 to 5 and that of springwood was pith, then decreasing outward in the juvenile core. However, 2 . This apparent contradiction, with summerwood shrink-the decrease in fibril angle often continues well beyond the ing more than springwood, is due to the fact that compres-juvenile core. For example, Ying and others (1994) found sion wood is essentially a summerwood phenomenon. that fibril angles in tracheids of fast-grown loblolly pines decreased...
