It must be remembered that the peculiarities resulting in cross-fertilization are the results of the inherent tendency in plants to vary coupled with the effect of the environment. Secondly, that these peculiarities are handed down through inheritance. Such being the case, we must not expect to find in the flower perfect adaptation in all respects to the visiting insect. The life of the plant is a series of adjustments. So far as we know, no plant is in perfect harmony with its surroundings. This being so, we are not surprised to find in our study of the interrelation of plants and animals bad fits, uncertain means and even useless floral organs. This is not always understood by students. Consequently, they feel duty bound to assign a reason for every dot, bar, and curve. We will now turn our thought to fruits, dealing with but two ideas, protection and dissemination of embryos. First it will be well to recall that the word fruit means something different to the botanist than it means in common usage. To the botanist the matured pistil of whatever nature is a fruit. By a matured pistil we have in mind the pistil that has been fertilized...
